Introduction

Welcome to this free report!

If you're planning on sending your son or daughter to college, it's easy to get caught up in the excitement of finding and getting into the best possible schools. Unfortunately, today's media can make it seem like that most students are NOT likely to get into a reputable college putting their future in jeopardy. And that's why I've created my list of 50-50 colleges.

This is a list of colleges students are likely to get into and even more importantly, graduate from. After all, isn't graduation the critical element in attending college?

Given the media's focus on a limited number of competitive colleges, the surprising aspect of the list is that there are over 500 colleges that meet this basic requirement. The depressing part is that this list accounts for only around a third of all 4-year institutions in the country.

The point of this list is to expand the pool of colleges to consider when deciding which colleges to include on your final application list. With the increasing costs of college attendance, it only makes sense to consider as many options as possible.

Who Am I And Why Should You Listen to Me?

Since 2011, I've helped over 2,000,000 find the information they need to find the colleges right for them and how to pay for it through my blog, DIYCollegeRankings.com. I've profiled over 200 colleges that accept at least 50% of students and have at least a 50% graduation rate. And I've developed my own formula for targeting colleges for merit aid.

In graduate school, I researched what caused students to drop out of high school. In my first job, I collected information to help agencies train and place people in the job market. Next, I provided census data and maps to people looking to make decisions for their organizations. After that, I put together information for hospital administrators to decide what services to provide and where.

Finally, I spent a lot of time researching information on homeschooling to decide if we should homeschool our son. We decided “yes” and that has brought me to finding out all kinds of stuff about curriculum, teaching, and socialization for ten years. During this time, I created a website to share all the stuff I found out with other homeschoolers.

The biggest test of my ability to find out stuff was getting my son accepted into a college with merit money and the opportunity to play baseball. He was accepted at all ten schools he applied to with average merit aid of $15,000 and the possibility of playing baseball for four of the schools. I felt like I just passed the ultimate graduate exam for homeschool parents.

During my son’s last two years of high school, I spent most of my time being my son’s college guidance counselor. Given I had only one student, I’ve probably spent more time researching college possibilities than the average public school guidance counselor who is responsible for 400 or more students.

So I decided to share what I’ve learned about the college search process so that others can get the information they need to decide which colleges to apply to.

DIY College Rankings 50-50 Colleges

This is a list of colleges where at least 49% of applicants are accepted and the five-year graduation rate for public colleges is at least 49% and the four-year graduation rate for private colleges is at least 49%. I use 49% since it is so close to 50 that it will include schools that would have made the list last year or maybe next year.

The purpose of this list is to identify schools that provide an acceptable education with a higher probability of being admitted compared to the more well-known, “competitive” colleges. Admittedly, the proxy for acceptable education, graduation rates, has some significant limitations. But given that at the most basic level, graduation represents successful college completion, it is a reasonable place to start. This is especially true when you consider the cost of higher education.

Graduation Rates

Since the cost of an extra year at a private school is dramatically higher than at a public college, I use the four-year graduation rate for private schools and the five-year rate for public schools. Keep in mind that the six-year rate is now the one being reported in most publications.

Test Scores

The list includes the 75th percentile college test scores for targeting colleges for potential merit aid. Again, there are all kinds of limitations to this data but generally students in the top 25 percent of a school's college test scores are likely candidates for merit awards. I also list whether the SAT/ACT test are required, recommended, or neither required nor recommended. Of course, a significant number of colleges have dropped testing requirements since of COVID. Therefore, it's essential that you check with the school for their latest policy. Furthermore, the number of students submitting test scores can be less than a quarter of students at many schools. This means that the reported scores are likely skewing higher than average since students are more likely to submit higher scores.

Average Net Price

The Average Net Price is the average price freshman paid after deducting any institutional or government gift aid (scholarships and grants) for the 2020-2021 year. This information usually lags behind other financial data by a year. However, it is still very useful for comparing colleges.

Application Fee

Undergraduate application fee is the fee the college charged for 2021-22 school year. The number of schools that waived their fee is much larger than in previous years because of COVID. Therefore, it's very important that you check to confirm their application fee for the coming year.

It Might be Wrong

This information is based on the data extracted from the Integrated Postsecondary Education Data System (IPEDS) in February of 2023. It is not necessarily comprehensive since data is missing for some schools. Furthermore, there have been some very public cases where the available information was found to be wrong. Whether it was IPEDS fault of that of the submitting institution is open to argument but the fact remains, use the information at your own risk. If something looks weird, it might be wrong.

The information for the 50-50 colleges is part of the DIY College Rankings Search Spreadsheet that includes information on over 1,500 four-year institutions in the United States. You can find out more information about the spreadsheet at www.diycollegerankings.com.
